I am not a terribly bright person. I won't pretend to know much about politics or the legal system, etc. This being said, I do like to think that I know a thing or two about right and wrong. So, the way I see it, is that cable companies are trying to pick and choose what people see on the internet. a website that has the money to shell out to be seen goes fast, while a website run from home by someone without the extra income is slowed down. essentially, If you don't have money you can't have a successful website. So internet start ups will become a thing of the past, for many this will mean loss of what job they might have.
