Net Neutrality is important for the economy, among other things. Verizon, ATT, and Comcast would be soaking up all the money from charging websites for faster service, and virtually none of that would be translated back into it's employees to circulate.

The websites that don't pay will fall by the wayside, such as those for people who make a living as artists and would not be able to afford or otherwise be impacted by such a charge and make life harder.

Other unique websites would quickly fade out, stifling creativity. People would choose not to put their voice onto the internet because they would have to pay extra they may not be able to afford on top of server costs and/or domain costs just to make sure that people could hear it.

These companies chose to supply internet, and now they seek to control it for their own interests.
