As a recently graduated high school student, I can tell you that I depend heavily on the Internet for research. In my studies, I have used everything from online academic journals to documentaries on Netflix. Now, I've seen the reports on how Comcast strong-armed Netflix into paying more for Comcast's services. This is akin to allowing the United States Post Office to charge National Geographic more to ship their product because magazines take up more room in the mail truck. Too many people have worked far too hard to spread information and almost limitless knowledge throughout the world for net neutrality to end now. As a student, an American, and a seeker of knowledge, I ask you to protect net neutrality from corporate interests.
