As an American it is my right to decide what I want to do with my time on the internet. I have already made a significant investment in being able to do this. The internet companies which are already getting paid more than they should, should not have the ability to then tell me that I can and cannot access, by letting some sites come through faster than others.

One of the main reasons people stop frequenting sites is when it loads slowly. It's an unwelcome form not only of censorship, but also of mafia like "protection scam," and it behooves the FCC to stand AGAINST these corporations and with the American people.

Living in a city with a Comcast monopoly, I can only see where things would get progressive worse.
