

7521370649.txt

I hope that the FCC understands the critical value of this country's most dynamic public infrastructure - The Internet - and, consequently, enshrines Net Neutrality as an inviolable principle and regulatory standard.

It would a true tragedy if we allowed private oligopolies (there is no reasonable other way to describe TWC and Comcast) to take control of a key source of current competitive advantage for this country that helps create more innovative businesses, provide new services to those in need (e.g. telemedicine), and allow every citizen to deal with the structural changes in our workforce by finding new ways to earn a living through online and internet-enabled employment.

Comcast, TWC, and their ilk are only in this position of attempting to hold our country's internet hostage because of government provided oligopoly and monopoly status in major MSAs across the country. If our federal, state, and city regulators had been effective at cultivating competition and innovation during the creation of this public infrastructure (operated by private contractors), then we might not have to insist for net neutrality now, though I think it's a critical principle irrespective of the level of threat against it. Now, Comcast, TWC, and their compatriots should not be allowed to use their oligopolistic positions to pay Congress (er- influence legislation) into further entrenching their anti-competitive practices.

Please do the right thing and enshrine Net Neutrality in the FCC's regulatory system and eliminate any consideration of paying these would be hostage-takers, TWC, Comcast, etc.

Thank you for considering my comments,
John "Jack" McCambri dge