As a consumer who is already plagued by cable companies increasingly raising rates, Internet neutrality should remain a very important control of the agency. As these companies are already provided the monopoly status that allows them to basically do whatever they want due to local governments' franchise agreements where they receive a sum of money to be able to provide their service it seems the only person who loses is the consumer as the cable company and government profit.

In a hostage situation you don't give the hostage taker more power to do more harm and ending the neutral nature of the Internet is doing just that, adding fuel to the problem.
