

Remember when cable had no advertising? Just a schedule with movies all day and night, interrupted by short subjects and the like? (Godzilla Vs. Bambi comes to mind). Paid service, no need for advertisements.  Now I need good internet service, the fucks at TW force you to take all these garbage channels I'm never going to watch and if I want to downscale the package, the internet speed goes down with it. Mediocre movies on the regular cable channels, anything even remotely worthwhile are on premium channels, of course a few extra shillings a month on top of what you already pay for "basic" service.

They even show commercials during the shows with those stupid goddamn things at the bottom of the screen. It's an outrage.

Some canceled their cable TV in 1998. When the FCC, in their infinite wisdom, chose to make it impossible for consumers to watch broadcast TV without spending more money, Some of these individuals even took down their antenna(s), and gave it and the television set to the local recycler. Now the corporations want to turn the Internet into cable TV. With Net Neutrality all websites traffic are treated equally whether you visit Netflix, YouTube, CNN.com you name it or even indy sites like Daily Caller or Daily Kos.
