

7521374645.txt

I work at a community college with many under-served students. If net neutrality is murdered, it would be devastating for all people (and I do mean actual people -- not corporations), but particularly so for under-served and already marginalized folks. Many of these folks access the internet from school and the public library where they do not have 24/7 access. So what they are able to read or research could be severely restricted by time if their research sites are not "favored." To read is to educate oneself. These corporations that want to control the internet could so very easily choose to slow down pages/sites that they do not agree politically with. This will decrease the ability of people (and again, marginalized people in particular) to educate themselves on political and social issues and to get a full, rounded picture of the issue so that they can come to a conclusion based on the facts and their own personal values. This would be an affront to the freedom of speech of those who use the internet as a platform to share their ideas and who could be essentially censored for no other reason than disagreeing politically with the media corporations who would control reasonable access. There is no good reason to allow a corporate takeover of the internet except cold, hard cash lining the pockets of a few. Stand up for the American PEOPLE. Do the RIGHT THING.