

I am writing in support of rural television such as RFDTV. Stations that carry information and entertainment pertaining to country life are not only educational for rural areas, but also for urban families to have a chance to see the ways that farming and ranching is still a vital part of our economy. Children can learn from watching shows about animals, crops, and country life, giving them a more rounded understanding of how vital agriculture is to keep America strong. There really is no reason to not continue to broadcast RFDTV as it has a strong base of viewership and is a competitive station in the broadcast market. Please consider the needs and tastes of all viewers and not a select few in a small area of the country when making decisions that affect so many.
