

7521377140.txt

The public (well, not so much anymore) has been bought by large corporations, but don't let the internet go down. Although I understand that whatever I say doesn't matter because of how fucked up this world is today (with heavy influence from the so called democratic country of the USA), I am going to try anyway. I also understand that this isn't new, with the NSA and the CIA blocking different websites, (see what i mean about tyranny, now they have to watch me just because I'm on the left wing, sounds pretty democratic to me, if you have a different belief than us, you are a threat and shall now be labeled as a terrorist just for wanting to make the world fair for everyone and not through violent means either. Wasn't Nixon heavily criticized for spying on people with different beliefs? Well i guess that won't happen now because people now a days all act like they are on MK Ultra :P) but you shouldn't let it go any farther. If we have no way of equally share are beliefs or opinions or just to engage and have fun (or work) with others, we are doomed to stay as a lost hope, a country that claims democracy and only gets short term dictators. Or we can by the blooming flower of democracy, showing the world we can live together, and not letting the cable companies end equality on the internet is the first step.