Preserving net neutrality in essence is preserving free speech. Giving the opportunities for so called "fast lanes" to be made is in effect allowing companies to censor what we see for their own gain. In a country that is free and as culturally advanced as the US, having full open access to the internet is essential to our growth as a society. It is practically essential, and should be treated as such. I support net neutrality, and I support treating service providers as utility companies. It's the only fair and just way to solve the argument.
