The price we pay right now affects our human right (as defined by the United Nations) to have access to "broadband internet." The current proposal is to have companies destroy competition in an open market, forcing monopolies on our hands. This has given companies the right to rule over the FCC and garner more money in their pockets, effectively increasing consumers fees to no end. This needs to stop. We stopped having proprietary railroad lines to further our economy, we have ample competition in coal, steel and other commodities. Can we not have net neutrality for an open and free market?
