Dear FCC,

My name is Kevin QuiGGLE and I live in Portage, MI.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs will be able to effectively censor the Internet by price discrimination. The Internet will become "pay to play."

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs will keep "regular" Internet users in the slow lane; there will be absolutely no incentive to improve current services.

I have been using the Internet almost since its inception. In the initial years, there was steady improvement in access as there was also real competition. Now, Comcast and ATT have divided ISP services into fiefdoms. There has been no significant improvement in ISP services in years - compare the US to the rest of world and it is clear that, comparatively speaking, we are getting worse. Far from improving services, the ISPs now want to put a cap on what they provide, so they can charge even more for the existing infrastructure without making any improvements. ISP promises to do better in the future are simply lies, as past history amply proves. The FCC plan to abandon net neutrality is nothing more than support for another money grab by monopolistic corporations who care nothing for the betterment of the United States.

Sincerely,

Kevin QuiGGLE
