Dear FCC,

My name is William Wright and I live in Coralville, IA.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it the Internet ceases being a tool that empowers regular people.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because it favors the success of a few at the expense of everyone else.

At the end of the day, the Internet is the only tool in our modern world that gives the ordinary person a voice against bloated governments and faceless corporations. So of course governments and corporations are against net neutrality, because they want to use the Internet to control people, not allow people to control them via the Internet. But this is the United States of America. We're supposed to make the choices that leave power in the hands of the people and tell business and government that they'll just have to make due with that reality. Net neutrality is the only choice that makes sense for America. Anything less is a betrayal of all the principles Americans claim to stand for.

Sincerely,

William Wright
