

7521394216.txt

Since the Internet has become a ubiquitous and transformative technology over the last couple decades to a greater degree than telephones, televisions, or radio, I support the view that it should be considered a public utility. If the Internet was regulated as a utility, all ISPs would have to treat everyone fairly, continually provide infrastructure improvements, and work for the benefit of the public instead of lining the pockets of already wealthy executives. As most major ISPs also dominate in the cellular, television, and other markets, they are perfectly capable of surviving the transition to utility status, and it is a change that would benefit all in the US.