Weakening the concept of Net Neutrality is terrible procedure, terrible policy and terrible for the continued growth of the online community and economy. There is no other way to couch this: ISPs are corrupt and anti-competitive, and have clearly delineated interests that harm consumers. All Internet users, regardless of their resources or size, have equal rights to the Internet; therefore, it follows that they should also have equal speeds for equal cost. If ISPs are unable or unwilling to create a sustainable system that accomplishes this, they should surrender to a utility than can and will. And while I am understanding that recent court decisions have made the FCC's authority in this matter grey, I urge the Commission to recognize that it is, first and foremost, a regulatory agency. Do not further dilute your power at the behest of special interests.
