I am writing to inform you of my extreme displeasure and vehement objection to allowing cable companies the opportunity to allow any sort of traffic on the internet to move faster than any other. To do so only provides a profit to cable companies and does little to help a consumer like me. As evidenced by nearly all other developed nations, a multitiered system is not essential to fast internet that meets today's digital demands.

In addition it is quite ridiculous to hire a man who lobbied congress for industrial sector (cable companies) to then turn around and regulate that same sector. It is appalling that this is not seen as a problem.

Lastly, the laughable statement that there is competition in the market with regards to internet providers, need to be rationally re-assessed. A simple survey across the nation would show that the large majority of Americans do not have access to more than one high speed internet provider where upload and download speeds are equivalent.
