As a rural user of AT&T Internet service, and wireless service via Verizon, I support net neutrality because rural and poor urban consumers tend to be the losers in such battles for customer service and competitive pricing. HOWEVER, as a supporter of capitalism I am opposed to additional government regulation in any free market. Left alone - other than regulations that ensure no monopoly and support competition in the marketplace - this market will find its center. Consumers will buy what they want to buy, and sellers will market and price adjust to earn a market share. This is a true free market and I believe in the best interest of Internet use by businesses and consumers, large and small, rural and urban. Competition and innovation will ensure the demand is met, at a fair price (meaning a price the market/consumer can or will bear).
