The internet is the voice of the current generation. Like the telephone before it, telegraph before that, and written letter before them all. They are the mediums with which an entire generation communicates, learns, does business and prospers. To not allow it the same freedom its predecessors had goes against common sense and fairness at the very least, and hurts us in ways that we cant yet imagine at worst. When the Googles and Microsofts of tomorrow are squashed in their infancy because they cant afford to pay for the access that used to be a given, what innovations will be lost forever? When citizens cant afford "fast lane" access to be able to reasonably use the internet for education and business, how many more opportunities will be lost? All of this sacrifice to give ISP's the final bit of control they don't yet hold? Control that has already been deemed to be unfair. It was the FCC's purpose to protect us from this situation, I would beg you to do that now.
