Dear FCC,

My name is James Gracey-Edwin and I live in Canton, CT.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that can't afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

An open internet is important, because there has never been a larger, more accessible source of information and innovation in human history. Giving corporations the power to play favorites with websites means that they can control the flow of information, and stifle innovation. This is not an issue the free market can correct.

The internet is too important to leave in the hands of corporations. New internet businesses need to have a chance to get started without being destroyed by fees, and users need to be able to reliably access information that hasn't been pre-approved by the ISPs.

Sincerely,

James Gracey-Edwin
