Dear FCC,

My name is Adam Nelson and I live in Northglenn, CO.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because ISPs could act as the gatekeepers to their subscribers.

I don't want my ISP to determine what content I have easy access to. As a subscriber, I feel that I have a right to view all content equally, and should not be subject to frivolous discrepancies companies have with each other. The internet is an open canvas for anyone who feels they can create something worth visiting, whether it's online services like email, networking, and drives in the 'cloud,' entertainment, or educational sites free to the public. If net neutrality is no longer enforced, ISP's will simply act like cable television providers, and the internet and its users will suffer accordingly.

Sincerely,

Adam Nelson
