Dear FCC, the internet (as it is right now) is probably the most amazing thing to ever come about in human existence. You want to learn how to take care of a baby bird because you just found one? You can do that. You want to start your own website? You can do that. Do you need funding for your upstart, homegrown business? You can get that on the internet too.

Ever heard the phrase "If it ain't broke, don't fix it"? Well, the internet isn't broken and it certainly doesn't need any "fixing". It doesn't need to be commercialized like the rest of America. It's one of the few places I can go and just feel at ease. No one is trying to force me to buy anything, I can look up anything I want, learn anything I want, make anything I want. I grew up on the internet, and sure, it has changed a little over the years, but the way I feel when I get on it is still the same as ever. I'm an interactive design major, and I plan to start my own business designing websites. I don't think I could stomach it if the internet became the next corporate cesspool.

Protect real net neutrality, please.
