

7521701398.txt

having net neutrality is, at this point, impeccable to society as a whole. I can see many ways that ending neutrality could be harmful, such as in education, reinforcing negativity, and our many rights as a United states citizen. In education many times we, as students, are required to watch videos, do horribly long research papers, and look at two views on issues. Wheeler's idea does not eliminate discrimination against online content, creating a faster connection even though you are not slowing the other one still creates a lag, why go to fox when cnn is faster? if i am writing a paper about a contraversial topic and i have just tonight to type the 5 page essay then i don't have time to use a website that is slower. do you really want your children to be persuaded in the education one way just because someone can make more money? don't you want a future generation that can be innovative, independant, and can make choices based on facts and not bias?

Imagine when your daughter say to you "i want to be smart" and not "i want to be beautiful". wouldn't that put the biggest smile on your face? but if a provider knows it can make more money by speeding up or aiding in the process of directing your young girl to a website that markets unrealistic beauty campaigns your daughters self esteem would plummet, along with thousands of others, young and old. do you really want your public's deppression on the rise? do we want more oppression, maybe more eattng disorders? how about your child committing suicide because they feel they will never be good enough just because beauty campaigns will pay more for providers to increase their connections?

what about our rights? freedom of religion, press, and speech and incredibly important. what if a ceo is christian and i am part of an online pagan community and all of the sudden IT'S NOT LOADING. what if i want to see the news from fox and the ceo doesn't then it is restricting fox's freedom of the press. and many people go on the internet to be heard, who are you to make it so that it is more difficult. unconstituti onal? wow i think i just heard the ground crumble underneath you.