

7521710254.txt

Dropbox, Inc. is deeply committed to preserving the open Internet as a platform for innovation.

The Internet has become indispensable in today's world for almost every business, industry, and individual. We are concerned that the usefulness and growth of the Internet could be hampered without bright-line FCC rules providing certainty to the Internet's users.

On May 7th, 2014, Dropbox joined 150 companies on a letter to the FCC explaining that we opposed the FCC's reported proposal, and believed that permitting ISPs to discriminate technically and impose new fees would represent a grave threat to the Internet.

Now that the NPRM has been made public, we are no less concerned about the FCC's direction. We urge the FCC to adopt simple, bright-line rules that prevent blocking, discrimination, and paid prioritization over fixed and mobile connections. We continue to oppose the FCC's proposal, and urge the Commission to revise the rules. We believe such action is essential for the future of online innovation and user choice online.

Respectfully Submitted,

Ramsey Homsany
General Counsel
Dropbox, Inc.