Government has enough problems garnering any credibility with those we are supposed to serve (I am a 40 year public employee). If net neutrality is not maintained it will be clearly because the handful major internet providers have more financial sway over elected and appointed FCC employees than the influence of the the millions of internet users who elected people to represent our interests. There are no real, viable needs to end neutrality. The internet is no longer a luxury in society. Every individual and every business, large or small, established or start-up should be able to access the data pipeline on a level playing field.

I urge you to maintain internet neutrality that has and will serve the best interests of millions of use and to resist the temptation to give into the strong financial and political influence of a handful of greedy corporate executives and shareholders.
