Dear esteemed members of the FCC,

I, like many others of this site, believe that the internet is not only a place of commerce and consumerism, but also a place where artists and creative people express themselves. A place where peers discuss open ideas like the Forums of old Rome. Quite simply, it is a place for the freedom of expression. The vast companies who wish to alter net neutrality do so out of wanting to selfishly cash in more money. Yet, this would allow the companies control over what content we, as consumers and citizens within our constitutional rights to express ourselves, are allowed to access. I implore you to reconsider the change in net neutrality, as it would affect you as well.
