The mergers of these entities are concerning to us as lifelong citizens of rural America, especially if these mergers take out the last of wholesome farming & ranching programming provided by channels such as RFD-TV. Change can't be stopped but it can be managed. The mega network's admission that they cater to metro populations begs the question on if allowing RFD-TV to continue will break them. Unlikely. Of, if they consider where and how the food on their table is raised, what agriculture has meant to our country, and the values and work ethic that country lifestyles instill in our society. Don't let the mega's with their tunnel vision on America's programming choices further merge. If it's allowed, don't give them overarching power to stomp out programming serving viewers in numerous states and communities, who for generations built our country. Please, let some good things remain.
