

Net Neutrality is vital to the Internet. It has allowed for the growth of progressive movements around the world and has allowed the public to connect as equals. Ending Net Neutrality could make education and information inaccessible. The Internet providers shouldn't be allowed to charge different companies more or less for their data or to slow down, or block, access to Web sites and services they don't like. Internet service should be like phone service: the phone company can't make the connection worse if they don't approve of the person you're calling. Net neutrality encourages a degree of playing arena for competing agencies, and permits easier starts up access to the latest potential clients. This is associated to free markets.