Please stop this merger. This is insane. The US has the slowest internet speeds in the first world. How is reducing competition across the nation going to lead to anything other than higher prices for customers, and a continuation of the lowest service levels in the developed world? These two companies have atrocious customer support/service reputations. How is merging the two going to improve that? We need MORE competition amongst cable internet and cable TV providers, not less competition. Currently, these two providers hold a stranglehold over cable TV and cable Internet customers in the areas they are positioned. There aren't multiple cable providers to choose from in any area I've lived in. Perhaps there are lots of cable providers in big cities. But outside the big cities (Chicago, New York, Austin, Chattanooga, St. Louis, etc.) in the urban, semi-urban, semi-rural and rural backwaters of the United States, where services and servicers are fewer, we already have no choices. There is no alternative to whichever provider we have. You either have Comcast, or you don't have cable TV/Internet around here. I shudder to think of what will happen to prices and service levels if this merger goes through. With appreciation for your consideration of my plea. --David Kenny
