

. I will be brief with a number of specific concerns people such as myself have to offer about net neutrality. Everyone must have access to important information such as research for instance. Those who have research papers in all educational levels need the internet to look up sources about their topics in online databases and their school's web resources. In my personal experience, I would not have graduated from Norwood High School in 2009 and the University of Massachusetts Boston this year without any access to web resources at any time whenever I needed them. I would not have explored through various social media sites like Facebook, Twitter, Tumblr, fan sites of any entertainment, Youtube, and many others to meet some new people who have similar interests as I do and to keep a network of friends I have met throughout my life so far. Finding employment and other opportunities online is crucial to others and myself. Yes, networking is another vital aspect in everyone's social lives. An open internet is important to artists who want to promote themselves like actors including myself and other projects to share with the public and/or within their networks; musicians, paint artists, and others should not be forgotten too. If it were not for the open internet, I would not be able to buy online at my convenience as much as anyone else; for my example, I would not have received the autographs I always wanted to have from the people who have inspired me. Without the open internet, I would not have found quotes, news, pictures, and anything else I find interesting. Anyone should be able to investigate issues happening around them in any area of life in our universe like politics for example; at least most people want to be informed and understand what is at stake in the issues affecting them. Without access to the internet, I would not be writing this letter electronically at my convenience to give a thought and a voice to the issue at hand here as well as taking other actions such as signing petitions online for various organizations who are willing to speak out against injustices anywhere. I like to keep being informed what is going on in other parts of the world whether it be the ugly injustices or the good news. I like to give whenever I can to organizations who need help with funding projects such as RiffTrax Live shows; another art illustration. The internet is meant to be open to everyone regardless of any personal identification, especially class. Money has no place in politics. My thoughts and feelings on net neutrality are genuinely what I experience and are legitimate. I try to write it all out, reach out, and convince the notion the internet world must remain open to all, especially without having mergers, conglomerate, and other business organizations taking over people's choices. We are human beings and beings of our universe; we are one with the universe and we are the universe. Thank you. Sincerely, Andrew Costigan
