Dear Mr. Wheeler, You should be one of the most trusted regulators on earth. You are certainly one of the most experienced persons in the industry you regulate. When you were in that industry your board and shareholders were your constituency. You did all that legal and fiduciary standards allowed you to do for that constituency. You are no longer beholden to that constituency. You have a new one. The citizens of The United States. Ours are now the only interests you must bind yourself to. Wisely, you may consider your former constituent's views to achieve a balanced examination. However, as in your old job, those concerns are tertiary at best. Citizens first. The branches of government second. All others, if at all, last. I suspect your compass still points to corporate north. Perhaps you have come to believe, as the legislative Supreme Court does, that corporations are people, citizens, voters. That the more money, the more speech. I would dissuade you from this corrupt view. It will prove devastating in the next few years. As with your absurd stance on internet neutrality, I question your loyalty to your constituents. I'll write to you separately on this subject. Suffice it to say, simply, I, we, do not trust you to decide anything on our behalf. But not to worry. You can become an actual hero of your constituency. Turn away the oligarchs: say no, in certain and complete terms, to this merger. Turn towards your constituency: say yes to us. We may then begin to trust you on internet neutrality and more. Looking for a perfect North Star to calibrate your compass? Simple. Ask yourself: "What would Teddy Roosevelt do?" His era's egregious combinations, your era's mergers. Both anti-competitive. Both amoral. Both Un-American at the core of their motivation. We are watching. We are acting.
