The Internet has become a major personal communication utility and commerce vehicle since its commercial deployment a few decades ago. There should be free and open transport / transit of communications content between internet service providers. If the FCC allows local access providers such as the telecommunications carriers and cable providers or any other local access provider restrict the flow of content or commerce, this will result in the constraint of trade and the reduction of choice to American consumers. In 1984 the local telephone monopolies were eliminated in the United States and a de facto reinstatement will impede economic growth and consumer choice.
