The potential harm to consumers and small business is tremendous if the FCC should allow the ISP providers to do away with Net Neutrality. It already costs more in the U.S. to get internet access and when we do get online it is at a slower average speed than most of the rest of the developed world. The regional monopolization of internet access has kept costs artificially high for consumers and the elimination of Net Neutrality will make an already burdensome problem worse. If the FCC should start regulating ISPs under Title II consumers would soon see better services at a reduced cost than they are experiencing in the virtual monopoly situation in place now. Please do not allow ISPs to further gouge consumers and small businesses by eliminating Net Neutrality and imposing more fees and charges on an already overpriced commodity that is quickly becoming as universally necessary as running water and electricity.
