

7521801091.txt

The Comcast merger is extremely concerning to me with respect to the effects of non-competition on Internet and cable customers, as it will likely diminish what is already minimal competition for high-speed Internet. Having spent only a few hours researching the Comcast merger issue it seems well documented that in large urban cities, such as New York City, that customers already pay inflated prices for slower Internet service. I was distressed in learning this fact and understanding more about our internet service. I had never realized this monopolistic issue before now. In New York City, competition for services is essentially non-existent, offering customers no option whatsoever and essentially forcing most of us to a sole provider, which is primarily Time Warner Cable. Accordingly within New York City, Time Warner Cable can name its price for cable services without threat of competition and little incentive to ensure that service is provided at the high level demands required in our The Twenty First Century. I am just amateur and please accept my thoughts as such, but it seems as though Time Warner Cable and Comcast already have the majority of power to set prices. I am also alarmed to find out that Comcast recently acquired NBC-Universal and this merger would consolidate two content empires. I sincerely oppose the Comcast merger since Comcast already has tremendous control. More control and less competition would undoubtedly allow Comcast to gain additional leverage in demanding higher payments from Customers as well as businesses seeking market access to the internet. I realize I am just simple citizen raising a voice of concern within a technologically vast subject and ask that the decisions being made reflect the legacy and integrity of The FCC in serving the common good of the American Public. Respectfully, I thank you.