An emergency alert on TV regarding a child abduction that takes several minutes to list all of the counties in northern California and Nevada and then gives NO information about the child (gender, age, height), the alleged abductor, possible vehicle information, or last-seen location is POINTLESS.

I'm not certain that TV alerts about thunderstorms and flash floods are that useful either. I'm in my house watching TV. What do I do about a thunderstorm? If I lived where there are tornadoes, that could be important information.

Cell phone alerts are more functional. EAS announcements about child abductions must have more information!
