I fear that allowing corporations to require/ control "fast lanes" for streaming content will result in decreased content availability/ censorship & increased cost to the consumer. I also believe it will quash innovation allowed by an "open" internet.

I would favor the internet being a regulated utility. Face the fact that in most peoples lives today the internet is a utility not much different than the electric company or the cable company. Most of us get internet via a cable company, so we ALREADY PAY for the service. These would be the same providers that currently complain that they need more money for streaming content. News flash: The bills the cable companies send out have not decreased in price with addition of broadband.
