This is one consumer (and a political conservative I might add) who is very happy with his EPB utility based service and fully supports FCC intervention in this case. High speed broadband is as vital as electricity in this country. Competition between private entities is usually the engine of innovation, but in this case overpriced mediocrity is the norm and none of the big players seem inspired to innovate to provide faster speeds at a fair price for their customers. Our country must have higher speeds across the board to remain relevant in the world economy. Go FCC! Stand up to the powerful private groups that would rather sit on their hands and overcharge for slow speeds instead of bringing this vital resource to the American consumer.
