Since the invention of the telephone, there has never been a better use of technology to disseminate information than the Internet. It brings the meaning of "freedom of speech" to the masses as never before. We no longer have to be part of a local street-based petition mob to have our opinions known to many others. And we also have the collective wisdom of hundreds of thousands, from within our own boundaries as well as those from abroad, to hone and culminate a better way to view our democratic way of living. Why would anyone, other than the greedy owners of the infrastructure which makes this exchange of information, want to restrict it? Much like the federally-imposed collapse of AT
