I once heard that the role of the government is to align self-interest with justice. My understanding of that saying is that when left to our own devices, we are more likely to do what we want to do for ourselves, and not worry about what is right or what is best for the collective society. I find it very regrettable that the policy drawn up by the FCC regarding net neutrality actually seems to serve the self-interest of certain internet providers, and swerves away from serving the common good. The reassurance that this new policy will not be abused by internet providers is a naive suggestion that contradicts every instance of abuse of law and regulation with loopholes. Creating "hyper-speed" lane and a "fast" lane will undermine fresh competition, which is the basis of a healthy capitalism, and it will inadvertently censor out voices which can't afford to be heard, which is a blow to democracy. Please, you can take this opportunity to make a lot of money, sure, but some things matter more than money. The role of the government is to pursue things that are bigger and more important than profit.
