First of all, I find it very troubling (but not surprising) that the FCC chairman is a former lobbyist for cable and cellphone companies. The idea that Americans have too little choice when it comes to selecting high-speed internet service is absolutely LUDICROUS when the choice you are proposing is for internet service providers to charge higher fees for faster access. This raises a whole crop of troubling implications about censorship and a two tiered internet. The FCC has been in the grips of corporate interests for far too long and it does not help that the chairman is a former lobbyist. Internet should be a PUBLICLY-OWNED internet utility. Certainly the FCC is aware of Chattanooga, Tennessee, where one gigabit-per-second is 50 times faster than the average US internet speeds (and just as fast as internet service in Hong Kong). A taxpayer-owned, high-speed fiber-optic network is the ONLY option, and it will help create jobs. Internet should be in the hands of We The People, not a for-profit corporation whose only interest is in squeezing as much money as possible out of us. They see us as consumers. Not citizens with rights that NEED TO BE UPHELD. A corporation should not have complete control over what the United Nations has defined as a HUMAN RIGHT! Can you imagine if our internet was as fast as the rest of the developed world... what a concept!
