

7521868594.txt

Allowing cable/ISP providers to slow down the internet for certain web sites/content is akin to allowing one business to physically barricade access to a competitor's business, which of course would not be legal. It's also not a free market or a level playing field. It's not democracy. It's not appropriate for a government to favor certain corporations. We don't want to end up like countries in which the government, or in this case corporations, control access to information. It's completely preposterous. Thank you.