The debate over Net Neutrality is yet another example of the FCC throwing its weight around. It is more than a government agency; it is a corporation that has, slowly, behind the scenes, spread its tentacles of censorship into all facets of American communication. The Internet is not primarily a recreational form of communication. It is not just about streaming video or playing games. The Internet is a new, potentially better way for Americans to stay united with their friends and family across the country. It is utilized by universities across the nation for research and advancing the American job force.

Yet the FCC believes it should censor the internet by playing favorites with certain companies who wish to pay for better speeds. This not only discriminates against young, upstart companies, it encourages the development of regional monopolies that will pass the costs of paying for greater rates of speed on to the consumer.

I will not stand for that. If my charges increase because the FCC forces this morally corrupt decision through, I will withdraw my funds from this economy. I will help create a movement of Americans who feel the same way. Millions, perhaps billions of dollars going into the pockets of these providers, and then the FCC will be withdrawn. The mere idea of this issue is so morally repugnant that I consider starting such a movement now.
