

7522134897.txt

Please keep Net Neutrality in tact, with no "fast lanes" for specific carriers. This isn't true freedom of speech, as it limits how far the speech of small businesses, bloggers, and independent artists can go on the web. Small businesses and smaller scale non-profit organizations benefit greatly from web searches as they stand today and throughout the 2010s. Why on earth would a notion of stifling their freedom of speech be something the FCC would entertain? This is clearly a ploy by Comcast and similar companies to profit from the ability of US citizens to speak online. I support small business and for the small, individual voices of bloggers to be of similar status as the large companies and organizations that can afford to pay to be at the top of the list in internet searches and have very fast internet. What losing net neutrality would do is beyond what middle-aged affluent people can comprehend, I suppose. But as someone who has student loans and no full time, high-paying job after months of searching, the internet is not only a fantastic resource to find budgeting help and job offers, but it also a nice relapse from reality. Take away the ability to do either at a reasonable pace and you've got an angry citizen. Multiply that by however many people have seen John Oliver's bit on the net, as well as all the clever ads by Imgur and Tumblr alike, and suddenly you'll have to answer a lot of very angry calls, some more angry and vocal than others. It is un-American to make the lives of our fellow citizens more difficult. It is un-American to stifle the growth of small business. It is also very un-American to flush an apple pie down the toilet while plucking a bald eagle, which is what many American bloggers will photo shop the FCC doing if net neutrality is vanquished. Vote in favor of keeping the internet a neutral boundary, where all voices of all sorts of people can be vocalized, heard, shared, or dismissed by those involved. Especially since I help pay your salary and benefits, it'd be really awesome for the collective you to think about the 313 million Americans you're supposed to help. Ignore whatever promises Comcast has made--they're paid to be crooks with their private money and lobbyists. I, however, can barely afford to feed myself and fill my gas tank, and therefore cannot afford to be a crook or have lobbyists. Think about me and the millions of Americans like me--what will be our benefit if our internet crawls and our collective creativity is stifled by increased fees, decreased webspace to collaborate, and a super-mega-monopoly that controls what we see, how fast we see it, and what we can share ideas on? How does that improve the system that's already in place? (Hint: it doesn't. It worsens the already spotty internet that's supposed to be Turbo speed, thanks-a-million Time Warner.) Support the public, keep Net Neutrality.