The ending of net neutrality is clearly an attempt by five or six multinational cable and communication companies to control the speed of everyone's internet access. There can be no good in this for the average person or start-up companies. It is clearly designed to milk as much revenue as possible from the web to put in the coffers of these multinationals. When I hear of the monopoly of markets that is occurring right now between companies like Comcast and Verizon, I question why anti-trust action has not already been taken. Having Tom Wheeler, a former lobbyist for the industry, selected to head the FCC boggles the mind. If you think people will accept this rule change without protest or civil disobedience, you are mistaken. As was stated during the American Revolution: Don't Tread on Me.
