Dear FCC,

My name is Rob and I live in St. Louis, MO.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it users may have fewer options and a less diverse Internet.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that can't afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

The Internet is important to me because it's one of the few free spaces where people can express their ideas and themselves without limit. Sure there are still people who censor and go over but it's a place where money doesn't rule the content. As students it has significantly improved us because we can look up any question we have without judgment or taking hours to find a book. The internet is a place of (relative) freedom that should not turn into another way for large companies to make money. That's like making us pay more to walk outside and talk to our neighbors. The internet allows us to talk to people quickly and efficiently and spread our ideas around the world. Don't take that away from us, please.

Sincerely,

Rob
