Dear FCC,

My name is Dana King and I live in St. Louis, MO.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that can't afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

The internet has shown itself to be one of the last great equalizers in our increasingly polarized society. Without ensuring equal access to the World Wide Web, we will be setting ourselves up for further disenfranchisement of entire segments of the population, solely at the discretion of profit seeking corporations. Capitalism has driven many great things, but unfettered, it has a profound potential for harm. The FCC is in a position to determine which side of history this decision falls on: enabling the robber barons to have free reign or reforming the system before it's too late.

Sincerely,

Dana King
