Dear FCC,

My name is Jackie Adams and I live in wellwhat, FL.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it ISPs could have too much power to determine my Internet experience by providing better access to some services but not others.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that can't afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

With net neutrality, there will be less and less ideas coming to light. The ideas of those who have already had huge success will continue to shine in the light, but what if their idea is outdated? What if a new comer with a new idea, someone who has an innovative thought comes along, but can't pay to have their idea put out there? That idea is washed into the sea of many other ideas, never to be heard of. The internet is the one place where everyone has a chance, where everyone's equality in bringing forth a right gives them all the same chance to succeed. With pay to win, everyone's right at equality for ideas, for thoughts and for concepts will be gone. It's like stripping someone of their right for speech.

Sincerely,

Jackie Adams
