Dear FCC,

My name is Patrick and I live in Kensington, CT.

Net neutrality, the principle that Internet service providers (ISPs) treat all data that travels over their networks equally, is important to me because without it users may have fewer options and a less diverse Internet.

A pay-to-play Internet worries me because new, innovative services that can't afford expensive fees for better service will be less likely to succeed.

The internet is extremely important for people like me; an average high school student. I use it for studying and occasionally movies. Now I know you must be thinking "this guy's just 16 what does he know." I know that it would be giving ISPs way too much power even when they already have too much. This country was founded for the PEOPLE not the business. Also if I someday wanted to start an online business for it to succeed I would need an immense amount more money to do so. Also if you do this you will inevitably have about 300,000,000 people that decide they don't like it and either find a way around it or stop using the internet. There's a lot of bullshit I've seen in government and businesses lately but this must be the stupidest. You would be limiting everyone. Plus if gigantic companies such as Netflix, Mozilla, and Vimeo are against it obviously it can't be good for them or anyone because I've not once heard of a big business do something bad for itself on purpose.

Sincerely,

Patrick
