Both of us work for nonprofits. That work--which helps people around the world and in the U.S.--requires using the Internet to communicate, do research and also market our work through online video. Allowing a tiered payment system is simply wrong and would impact not only our work but our entertainment as well. Internet access is now a utility--not a choice between first class and coach on an airplane. If our water companies were allowed to offer dirty water at low pressure to the poor and clean water and high pressure to those who could afford it, people would be up in arms. Paying for how much you use is one thing. Throttling in order to add money to the already outrageous profits of ISPs is wrong.
