The Internet is an equalizer that allows all types of content to compete directly, whether it's produced by an amateur filmmaker or a large corporation. Allowing fast-lanes to short-circuit the direct access between producer and consumer would radically alter the Internet as we know it and would stifle the worldwide network of information and creativity. Please do not allow corporate interests to limit access, directly or indirectly, to content. The Internet should remain available to all, regardless of what media they choose to consume or who their service provider is.
